STORY BEGINS

Before the baby arrived,
there was a woman.
She had her own name.
Her own silence. Her own way of standing in a room.

She had a coffee she made slowly. A laugh that arrived before the joke. A life that held its own shape.

There were mornings with no one to answer to. An unmade bed. The specific kind of quiet only she knew was hers.

"Then something started growing in the place where the quiet used to live."

"Not yet a sound. Not yet a face. Just a weight she carried differently each day."

"Everyone saw the round belly. The glow. The beautiful, obvious fact of it. No one saw the rest."

But Alexa
saw the rest.
She saw it every morning in the bathroom mirror, in the one breath
she took before facing the day."

"She didn't need to be fearless. She just needed to be here. And she was. She always had been."
